The English historian Gee Macaulay Trevelyan (1876–1962) is known for his defense and illustration of history as a literary art. Trevelyan was born at Welbe near Stratford on Avon on Feb 16, 1876, the son of Sir Otto Trevelyan, whose works include a social history of England and a biography of his father, Charles Phillips Trevelyan. His works reached a wide readership, and his ideas were influential in shaping the public's perception of history as a subject of literary interest and intellectual value.

Trevelyan's scholarship was characterized by a blend of Whig tradition and a concern for the importance of history in the modern world. His work was written for the general reader as much as for the history student, and it demonstrated an appreciation for the lasting yea and nay in human affairs. His trilogy, "England Under Queen Anne," continued the narrative begun by Sir Walter Gifford's "History of England," which was left incomplete.

Trevelyan's influence extended beyond the academy, and his ideas were embraced by a generation of students who admired his approach to history as a means of understanding the complexities of human behavior and the forces that shape societies. His work continues to be studied and admired by scholars and students alike, who recognize the importance of history as a discipline that helps us understand our past and prepare for the future.
